G.W story

1. G.W. describes young people as being full of energy and aspirations. In what ways do you think young people today are similar or different in terms of their hopes and goals for the future?
 2. G.W. expresses frustration with the world's inequality, describing how some people live at the expense of others. How do you think society has changed since his time? Are there still similar struggles today? What can young people do to challenge these inequalities?
 3. G.W. reflects on feeling at home in the youth movement and finding a sense of belonging. Do you ever struggle to find a place where you truly feel understood and accepted? What qualities do you think make a group or community supportive?
 4. G.W. is deeply inspired by his ideals of a better world, including classless society and true brotherhood. What ideals do you hold, and how do you think they can shape the world you want to live in? Do you think ideals like these are achievable today?
 5. G.W. credits the Bund for bringing Jewish culture out of the "dark alleys of the medieval ghetto" and for elevating Yiddish culture. How important is cultural heritage and community in shaping a person's identity and actions? Do you think young people today are aware of the importance of preserving their culture?
 6. Despite the struggles G.W. describes, he remains hopeful for a brighter future. In your opinion, what is the role of hope in overcoming adversity? How can hope influence the choices we make in our lives?
